Although New Hampshire (NH) ranks as one of the healthiest states in the nation, overall health statistics obscure pockets of neighborhood-level health inequities. For more than a year, the HEAL NH Active Recreation Workgroup conducted an inventory of public park and recreation spaces in ten of NH's highest need communities. These communities were identified by location (urban and rural settings) and certain socio-economic and health indicators using the Social Vulnerability Index (SVI). Active recreation areas were then mapped for each community and visual data analysis was conducted using Geographic Information Science (GIS). The inventory is the first phase of work being done by the Active Recreation Workgroup to help increase equitable access to indoor and outdoor recreation facilities throughout the Granite State.
